

Essay on Bhairab River in Bangladesh

Bhairab is a river in southern Bangladesh. It goes through Khulna, which divides the city into two parts. The Bhairab river originates in the border area and flows through Meherpur and Jessore city. The river is about 100 miles long and 300 feet wide. Its average depth is 4 to 5 feet with a minimum flow of water that has a lot of silt.

The Bhairab river, a major river delta area in the region. Its name means "terrible" and testifies to the extent that it was reached when the main volume of the flood was for them. Currently, the mainstream is not navigable in Bagherpara Upazila (Jessore District). It has two main branches, the Ichamati (Khulna-Ichamati) and Kobadak. Part of the Khulna-Ichamati is in India and partly in Satkhira district, Bangladesh, which forms the border between the two countries.

The Bhairab river has two branches, the Khulna-Ichamati and Kobadak. The Khulna-Ichamati forms the border between Bangladesh and India. The cities of Khulna and Jessore are on the banks of the river. The development of settlements and culture were affected by the river.

The river is known under various names in its history. Downstream Kaikhali Kaliganj the Kalindi and Raimangal of which has a large estuary. It is divided into two parts, called the western arm and Eastern Hariabhanga retaining the original name. Kaikhali Downstream, the river is known as the Khulna-Ichamati, while the south-Raymangal Hariabhanga. The total length of Bhairab is about 250 km. In the monsoon season, the Ganges is fed, but during the dry season, it is dry. Its lower reaches are still navigable throughout the year and is influenced by tides.

The Bhairab, which has a higher origin than the main river Jalangi is out of the river at one point a few miles north of arisen with (West Bengal) away. After a tortuous course in the south-east forms the boundary between towards Meherpur PS (Bangladesh) and arisen with (India) for a short distance and then turns south and flows past Meherpur hp comes to town in the south Meherpur and lost in the closure of east Kapashdanga Mathabhanga. Jalangi has clogged the intake of this river is virtually dead for a long time. The climate of poor Meherpur, located on its banks, largely due to standing water.

Jessore and Khulna city on the bank of this river. In the past, the Bhairab great influence on the development of settlements and culture in these two cities. The Hindus consider sacred. Meherpur, Chuadanga, Barobazar, Kotchandpur, Chaugachha, Jessore, Daulatpur, Khulna, Bagerhat and removed belong to the major towns on the banks of Bhairab.